If my child is carrying a stone in his hand, may I lift him up? Is it as if I am carrying the stone as well?

The *Shulchan Aruch*¹ teaches us that if a child is yearning for his father, the father may pick him up even though the child is holding a stone in his hand. However, he says, that this is on condition that the child would become ill if not lifted up. The reason it is otherwise forbidden is because it is considered as if the father himself is holding the stone. If the child would not become ill, even though the child is yearning for his father, it is forbidden to lift him as long as he is holding muktze.

Tosefos in Shabbos 142a asks that one should first make the child discard the stone and only then pick him up. Tosefos answers that the child would cry if he were made to discard the stone.

In other words we have a chain reaction: the child may be lifted while holding muktze if he would become ill, and the muktze need not be discarded if the child would cry.

What if he is carrying money?

The Shulchan Aruch continues that if the child is holding money² it is forbidden to pick him up even though the child would become sick, because if the money would fall from the child's hand the father would stoop and pick it up, which involves handling muktze directly. In contrast, if the stone would fall from the child's hand the father would not be concerned enough about it to pick it up. (It does not mean that one must stand idly by while his child becomes sick, it means that lifting him with money in his hand is forbidden and it is up to the parent to either make him discard the money or substitute it for something else). Rashi holds that even holding the child's hand is forbidden if he is holding money lest the money falls and the father will pick it up, but the Ramban disagrees and permits it. The Elya Raba (quoted by the Bi'ur Halacha) says that the Ramban can be relied upon where a case of illness is involved.

If a bowl of fruit has a stone inside it as well, am I permitted to lift the bowl?

The *Shulchan Aruch*³ continues that one is forbidden to lift a bowl of fruit with a stone inside it as well. The reason is because Chazal forbade carrying muktze even through another item. This is called tiltul min hatsad – indirect handling, and it is also forbidden. As to the correct handling of the bowl, the gemora lays down certain rules, which are true the father would normally not stoop to pick it up, it would have then the same rule as a stone.

³ Simon 309:3.

for all handling of muktze through tiltul min hatsad.

	Hard fruit ⁴	Soft or overripe fruit ⁵
One only requires the bowl	Must tip out the bowl's contents	May carry the bowl as it is
One requires the bowl and the fruit	Tip out the bowl and gather the fruit	May carry the bowl as it is
One requires the space the bowl is occupying	May carry the bowl with the fruit and the stone inside	May carry the bowl as it is

The muktze item which in this case is the stone, must be tipped whenever feasible. Therefore when there are hard fruit in the bowl, the contents must be tipped out and the fruit gathered back into the bowl.

If the fruit are soft and will spoil if tipped out, one may carry the bowl as it is.

If one needs the space the bowl is occupying and tipping the contents will not alleviate the problem because the stone will land in the required space, the bowl with its contents may be carried as they are.

The *Shulchan Aruch HaRav*⁶ asks why is it that the bowl may be carried with the stone inside (when the fruit are ripe and soft) and the child may not be lifted up when carrying the stone unless he is yearning terribly for his father?

He answers that Chazal permitted carrying muktze indirectly when one requires the permitted article, provided that he cannot discard the muktze, but to lift the permitted item unnecessarily is forbidden because of the muktze. Therefore, since the father is not interested in lifting the child at that particular moment, it is forbidden to do so, unless the child is yearning for his father.

Vort on the Parsha

Rashi tells us that Bilam saw that the tent openings were not facing each other and a Ruach of Hashem descended upon him. The explanation might be that Bilam had set out to harm Bnei Yisroel by implanting a wedge of hatred between fellow Jews. When he saw each Jew content with himself and with his own and would not look at his neighbor's possessions, there was no place for him to place a wedge between fellow Jews because there was no division at all. The consequence of beholding such beauty is Ruach Hashem.

Food For Thought

If I forgot money on my pillow before Shabbos, is my pillow muktze?

What am I supposed to do with it? May I tilt it into a drawer?

Does the Shabbos table become muktze because of the Shabbos candles?

Is a drawer with money, or other muktze items, muktze?
